Manufacturing PMI has been >50 for the last two quarters after an extended period of weakness. Manufacturing Industrial Production (IP) has also (mostly) continued to tick upwards along with it. Multiple companies in the industrial complex have shown strong order growth in 2Q26, giving investors hope that a broad-based industrial recovery is currently underway (thereby enabling investors to participate in growth ex-AI). However, there has also been skepticisim from others who believe this is all second-order demand driven by data centers.

The manufacturing IP index (a measure of volume / real growth) has grown by ~3.8% annualized over the last 6 months when the long-term average of real GDP growth is generally closer to ~2% and manufacturing IP growth is flattish to <1%. So optically, we are running far higher than historical averages. However, ~75% of growth is concentrated in sectors that account for <25% of the total index, and the majority of which are exposed directly or indirectly to data centers. This is lower than our note last month, where >90% of activity was concentrated in <25% of sectors but remains material.

We estimate 130 bps of this 3.8% comes from sub-sectors heavily weighted to data centers (specifically semiconductors, commercial HVAC, engines and turbines, batteries, cement and concrete used for construction). Another 110 bps comes from the auto sector. This weights towards heavy trucks, pickups, vans, SUVs used by construction teams, repair technicians, last-mile fleets, rental car companies, and other small businesses. The latter three buckets show limited growth (the focus has been on driving more efficient asset usage, cost pressures) which then implies demand is concentrated in construction and repair - both of which skew heavily towards DCs. Passenger vehicle IP growth remains tepid. The last major driver is aerospace which contributes ~50 bps given broader tailwinds in the sector across both commercial and defense. The remaining 75% of index weights for IP account for ~90 bps of growth (vs. ~50 bps in last month's note). This is just one month of data, so we would need to see more to definitively say there is a broadening out at play.

As we have stated in our earlier note, given AI capex numbers continue to tick upwards, we do not necessarily think this is a bad thing for the broader industrials complex but we clearly see that sub-sectors exposed to DCs continue to drive the bulk of the growth. So for investors playing the space, it is important to acknowledge that this will continue to be heavily-linked to AI capex (and therefore exposed to any spending slowdown from hyperscalers). Our key takeaway is more that buying short-cycle names in this environment does not mean that investors are participating in a broadening of sectoral growth or reduce exposure to the broader AI trade. Caveat emptor!
