Venture Global: More Than an LNG Story? Initial Thoughts on the AI Infrastructure Opportunity

VG's latest announcements around power island expansion and its framework agreements with GE Vernova and Baker Hughes materially broaden the investment thesis beyond LNG export growth. While the market has previously viewed the company through the lens of LNG growth, management is now positioning VG as a potential infrastructure provider to the AI ecosystem, leveraging assets it already owns: gas supply, behind-the-meter generation, land, water infrastructure, permitting expertise, and execution capabilities.

Importantly, management emphasized that major capital commitments are essentially delayed until customer demand is visible. Deployment will be staged and market-driven, with additional power islands ordered only as commercial arrangements are established.

This remains a supply-side strategy today. VG has secured turbine, transformer, and switchgear capacity, and is working on acquiring customers to sign data center tenants. Management appears focused on securing scarce power equipment first, then matching capacity additions with customer commitments over time.

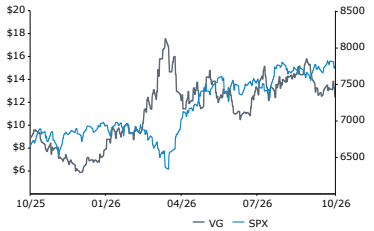

Unlike many AI infrastructure announcements that begin with land banking or conceptual development plans, Venture Global already operates a large private power network for its LNG operations, and is extending an existing platform rather than creating one from scratch.

WHY THIS MATTERS

The investment thesis is clear: the AI industry is increasingly constrained by power availability. VG believes it can solve one of the largest bottlenecks in the AI infrastructure by providing grid-independent power at scale. Keeping it grid-independent keeps them out of the electricity affordability debate.

Unlike greenfield data center developers that must secure interconnection rights and utility cooperation, VG already operates a private industrial power network, with approximately 4.5 GW of generation ordered, operating, or under construction across its LNG facilities. The company now has agreements supporting up to 16 additional 720 MW power islands, creating a pathway toward more than 10 GW of incremental power capacity over time.

Management's argument is that it is uniquely positioned to provide:

- Behind-the-meter, island-mode power generation
- Dedicated natural gas supply
- Closed-loop water systems
- Thousands of acres of adjacent land (which VG has acquired)
- Existing transmission, electrical, and industrial infrastructure
- Large-scale project execution experience

Taken together, Venture Global is effectively creating a vertically integrated "AI utility."

THE REAL ASSET HERE MAY BE THE POWER INFRASTRUCTURE

One of the more interesting aspects of the story is that the power infrastructure itself may possess substantial standalone value.

The company has locked in turbine and electrical equipment supply through framework agreements at a time when power equipment availability has become one of the industry's most significant constraints. The framework establishes pricing and delivery schedules through 2034 while preserving flexibility regarding whether and when VG ultimately exercises purchase rights.

Management appears to believe scarce power capacity could create significant value before any compute facility is built. The first major purchase order is expected by year-end 2026, with deployment occurring only as customer commitments emerge.

WHAT IS THE CAPITAL PLAN? DOES IT AFFECT DELEVERAGING?

Management emphasized that major capital commitments are essentially delayed until customer demand is visible.

The rough framework discussed suggests:

- Initial power infrastructure is built ahead of customer deployment
- Compute buildings are added in phases, potentially in 250 MW increments
- Development appears structured around project-level financing rather than large upfront corporate commitments

Based on management commentary, a 250 MW campus may require roughly $4-6B of total investment, with power and electrical infrastructure representing about one-third of that cost. Larger multi-gigawatt campuses could ultimately be financed with debt, limiting the amount of equity required from Venture Global.

If the company can achieve something close to a triple-net lease model, where customers bring the compute equipment while VG provides powered shells and underlying infrastructure, returns could prove materially higher than traditional power development projects.

WHAT MAKES THIS INTERESTING

The market understands Venture Global's LNG growth story - now there is optionality embedded in the company's power platform.

The company currently states that the new agreements support both future LNG growth and adjacent data center development. Equipment reserved under the agreements can be allocated either toward LNG expansions or AI infrastructure depending on economics.

That flexibility may be particularly valuable given:

1. Persistent shortages of large-scale power availability.
2. Lengthening utility interconnection timelines.
3. Scarcity of turbine, transformer, and switchgear manufacturing slots.
4. Growing hyperscaler demand for multi-gigawatt campuses.

If compute demand remains as robust as many expect, the value of a permitted site with dedicated fuel supply and several gigawatts of firm power could be substantial.

KEY QUESTIONS THAT REMAIN/ RISKS

The announcement came at a time when the market is exhibiting concerns around the financing of the AI buildout. That aside, we think investors still need answers to several critical questions:

Distraction risk: Could this introduce execution risk on the core LNG business?

Customers: What level of customer interest exists today, and when might the first commercial commitment be announced?

Capital requirements: How large will the outlay be? What will the funding mix look like: debt vs equity?

Equipment risk: The framework secures manufacturing capacity, but how protected are delivery schedules and pricing if end-customer commitments are delayed?

Gas supply: How much incremental gas would be needed at full buildout, and how does that interact with future LNG expansion projects?

Timeline: Management expects to place its first power island order by the end of 2026 and has stated that development will occur in stages tied to commercial demand. The pace of customer signings will ultimately determine valuation.

BOTTOM LINE

We view the announcement as a strategic reservation of scarce power infrastructure. Venture Global has effectively secured long-lead turbine, transformer, and switchgear capacity while preserving flexibility on when and where that capacity is deployed.

The LNG story remains unchanged, but the market may need to begin assigning value to a second business that sits adjacent to it. If management can convert its power platform into long-term compute infrastructure contracts, investors may increasingly view Venture Global not simply as an LNG exporter, but as one of the few companies capable of delivering multi-gigawatt AI infrastructure at scale over the next decade. The missing piece today is customer interest. Once the market sees evidence of tenant demand, the debate is likely to shift from whether Venture Global can build the power to how much that power platform is worth.
