Talks on “Pacing the Frontier” continue - highly recommend you to read my US and EU peers - Mark Schilsky and Scott Silver's write-ups for commentary and feedback from their respective markets.

China Internet: capex is inevitable, monetization is the tell. Now China internet is hyper-sensitive to any capex lift, yet AI spend looks unavoidable: Zhipu fell 9% after a US$5bn raise, and Alibaba may push capex above its RMB380bn three-year plan into Apsara (Sept 22–24). Tencent is funding via asset sales (36.6m Kanzhun block; ADR lag) after BILI. The gating question is ROIC - investors are not yet convinced, so the scramble is for the “R”. We aim to find out more at our China AI Application Forum tomorrow - pinning Zhipu's cybersecurity narrative and any trace of monetization opportunities within existing established ecosystem similar to Meta's Muse.

CHINA INTERNET: CAPEX IS INEVITABLE, MONETIZATION IS THE TELL

Weak sentiment across China internet and investors are getting increasingly sensitive to any hint of a capex lift - arguably the last thing the market wants to hear - but it also feels essentially unavoidable for the internet/model complex. Zhipu was down 9% after completing a US$5bn financing (US$2bn equity placement + US$3bn convertible issuance). BABA: Into the 2026 Apsara Cloud Conference (Sept 22–24), there are now expectations that Alibaba will lift capex above its prior RMB380bn three-year framework. Tencent's disposals of listed holdings continues after BILI. A Form 144 filed overnight indicates Image Frame Investment HK (a Tencent subsidiary) offered 36.6m Kanzhun shares via block trade at HK$60.67 (3.85% discount to last close), raising ~US$287mn, with a 60-day seller lock-up; Kanzhun's ADR closed ~4% below local.

The gating question, as Alex frames it, is what level of return ultimately justifies this capex. Right now, investors are not fully convinced... If the step-up in invested capital is unavoidable, the scramble is for the "R" - monetization - which makes Z.AI's recent comments on cybersecurity monetization (in the context of pacing AI growth) feel increasingly relevant. It's also a good moment to revisit Alex/team's work on Tencent Weixin monetization, especially with Meta Musa continuing to draw attention.

One last reminder: at tomorrow's China AI Application Forum, we're speaking with BABA, Z. AI, JD, Kuaishou, Xunce, SenseTime, and Phancy and we'll be paying extra attention to the themes above.

- Tencent (0700) Weixin agent turns AI commerce from optionality into milestones - Alex Yao Ten months ago, we framed Weixin agentic commerce as a three-level opportunity (Tencent: Analyzing Tencent's potential with AI agent): 1) a better lead-generation tool; 2) a semi-marketplace built on broader merchant supply; and 3), a dominant top-of-funnel commerce platform. That framework suggested RMB69bn to RMB426bn of potential 2030 incremental revenue, but it was largely conceptual. The key uncertainty was not whether Weixin had traffic, merchants, mini programs, and payments. It did. The uncertainty was whether an AI agent would actually ship inside Weixin, what level of transaction authority it would have, and whether Tencent could build agent-callable supply without relying on incumbent ecommerce platforms opening inventory. With Tencent starting to beta test the Weixin agent in June 2026, our conviction in our three-level value creation framework has increased significantly. The agentic service is now visible enough to separate what already exists from what still needs to happen. This turns the Weixin agent from an undated AI optionality into a staged rollout with observable milestones. In our view, the first stock-market impact from the Weixin agent launch is more likely to come through a lower risk premium and a higher multiple than through near-term EPS.
