What's New in the 10-Q, Including 2 Post-Earnings Thoughts

Could Apple be setting an overly conservative bar for Sept Q earnings in 3 months? Perhaps. Why isn't the market as focused on Apple shifting to a subscription model? Too early. And what are 3 clear observations from Apple's 10-Q? Rising inventory, rising AI costs, and slowing App Store growth.

Key Takeaways

- Apple's 7.5% drop reflected high expectations after a strong run; at ~30x P/E, valuation remains well above levels typically seen in bearish markets.
- Apple's September outlook may be intentionally conservative, with supply constraints potentially overstated, creating room for an upside earnings beat.
- Apple's $1/day iPhone leasing model could accelerate its shift to subscriptions, supporting higher customer lifetime value and valuation.
- New 10-Q disclosures highlight rising component and AI infrastructure costs, increasing margin pressure if spending outpaces monetization.
- Services revs missed expectations in Jun and Sept, while Apple dropped App Store as a key Services growth driver from 10-Q, highlighting ecosystem risks.

Why was Apple down nearly 8% on Friday; do you really believe the quarter changed sentiment/positioning that notably? This was investors' most frequently asked question on Friday, as Apple's 7.5% drop was the single worst day for the stock since March 2020, and Apple's largest single-day market cap loss ever. We wouldn't over-complicate Friday's action – in the month up to earnings, Apple had outperformed the S&P 500, NASDAQ, and median Tech megacap by 20 pts, 23 pts, and 20 pts, respectively, meaning even after Friday's record move, Apple is still outperforming all tech megacaps except AMZN for the year. Said differently, the stock had a huge intra-quarter run, the setup at 33x P/E was challenging – as we previewed – and the combination of (1) a double Services expectation miss (i.e. missed June and guided below on September), and (2) gross margin headwinds left shares back to where they were only 1.5 months ago. In reality, the stock is still trading at 30x P/E; far from "concerning" or bear-like levels. Amidst the rush of quarterly data points associated with earnings – 3 of which we summarize from the 10-Q below – we felt it important to share 2 additional observations post-earnings:

- Is Apple intentionally taking a conservative outlook on the September quarter? Potentially, yes, setting up incoming CEO John Ternus for a proper

"beat" at F4Q earnings in late-October. We say this because Apple highlighted ~3.5 pts of supply shortages in the September quarter, attributable primarily to Mac and iPhone. However, any A-series SoC shortages for the iPhone are not apparent to us in our TSMC supply chain checks, which means the implied supply shortages would fall entirely on the Mac – 3.5 pts of supply shortages = $3.5B revenue shortfall, or a 40 point differential between our current Sept qtr Mac revenue forecast and what is "possible". We acknowledge long Mac lead times, but think this could be over-exaggerating the near-term Mac supply shortfall, in which case Apple would be setting up an overly-conservative Product revenue bar to clear 3 months from now.

- Is Apple's new leasing program getting enough positive recognition? In 2022 we argued that Apple's path to a $3T+ market cap was "cheaper than a cup of coffee" (Apple, Inc.: The Path to Over \$3 Trillion of Market Cap Is Cheaper Than a Cup of Coffee \(21 Jul 2022\)) – at the time, Apple customers were spending an average of just $1.15 per day ($35/month) on all of their Products and Services, far below the cost of daily utilities, including an expensive NYC coffee (today Apple spend per day is still just $0.81). We further argued that while Apple had many of the characteristics of a successful long-term subscription business, a more prominent shift towards a subscription model would help the market view Apple through a lifetime value (LTV) lens (i.e. above-peer FCF multiple). Somewhat inconspicuously, that shift is happening in real time, as Apple's new leasing program with Klarna now allows US consumers to pay $1/day and never own their iPhones but to upgrade them every year. But the stock isn't responding to this. In our view, if Apple goes a step further to broaden this program internationally and pair it together with the AppleOne Services subscription, then Apple could seemingly make the broad overnight shift to a subscription model without changing rev rec accounting, which we'd see as a potential under-appreciated valuation tailwind.

10-Q Observation #1: Component costs/sourcing are now explicitly acknowledged headwinds that could pressure both profitability and product availability. After highlighting a "supply chase mode" environment earlier this year, Apple is now going a step further in their 10-Q by warning that it is experiencing "supply constraints and increasing costs for components" driven by advanced semiconductors (i.e. TSMC's 3nm wafers) and NAND/DRAM, and that it "expects these trends to intensify." As CEO Tim Cook mentioned in a WSJ interview, Apple is now starting to leverage its own balance sheet to mitigate the impact from memory crunch – Apple's balance sheet inventory grew nearly 90% Y/Y exiting the June quarter (Exhibit 1), and when we include off-balance sheet items, overall inventory (inclusive of non-trade receivables and manufacturing purchase obligations) increased 38% Y/Y exiting June quarter, an all-time high for the quarter (Exhibit 2). In our view, this reflects non-SoC inventory purchases to ensure ample supply ex-bottlenecks, and it's unclear how much of this inventory is memory. Apple also acknowledges that pricing may not be a complete solution, noting that "actions, such as price increases, that have been and may in the future be taken by the Company may not effectively mitigate these negative impacts [i.e. revenue, cost, gross margin]" and could ultimately reduce demand. This new disclosure is particularly notable as Apple had historically been reluctant to explicitly discuss pricing as a margin lever until last quarter, and this also highlights that Apple doesn't rule out further pricing increases in the future (iPhone 18 Pro/Pro Max are the most imminent ones). Meanwhile, the reference to products utilizing "new technologies" facing "initial capacity constraints" appears especially relevant ahead of the Foldable iPhone launch, where display/hinge supply could remain tight until yields and manufacturing capacity mature. For what it's worth, we haven't seen any meaningful foldable iPhone build adjustments so far, and we continue to embed 6.5M of foldable iPhone shipment in our December quarter forecasts.

10-Q Observation #2: Apple's AI strategy increasingly at risk of higher infrastructure costs vs. execution-dependent revenue opportunities. While investors often focus on AI as a future growth driver, the latest 10-Q highlights Apple's new language pertaining to the growing costs needed to support their AI ambitions. Apple notes that its AI and machine learning offerings depend on access to sufficient computing resources and warns that industry-wide demand has resulted in "constrained supply, extended lead times, and increasing costs." The company further acknowledges reliance on 3rd-party cloud providers and cautions that it may be unable to secure adequate capacity "on commercially reasonable terms, or at all." In practical terms, this creates risk to both margins and product execution – insufficient compute capacity could delay new AI features, while excess provisioning could drive higher-than-expected infrastructure spending. Notably, Apple's R&D spending is already elevated due to "higher infrastructure-related costs, including investments in artificial intelligence," suggesting AI is becoming a more meaningful contributor to the company's cost/expense structure. For context, Apple's R&D % of revenue rose to 10% in F3Q26, an all-time June quarter high (Exhibit 6). As a result, AI now represents both an opportunity to drive future Products (accelerated replacement cycles and/or new product introductions) and Services demand, but also a potential incremental source of earnings risk (costs/expenses) if monetization lags investment.

10-Q Observation #3: Services remain heavily dependent on a healthy 3rd-party developer ecosystem, important to both Products demand and App Store monetization. Apple explicitly states that customer purchasing decisions depend, in part, on the availability of 3rd-party applications and services, warning that if developers cease to support the platform, "customers may choose not to buy the Company's products." While this language has long existed in various forms, it feels increasingly relevant today as developers allocate resources across competing app ecosystems, and make decisions around investments in next-gen applications – and as Apple mgmt explicitly calls out weakness in mobile gaming last quarter. In the 10-Q Apple also acknowledges that developer economics matter – if developers pursue "alternative methods of distribution and payment," Apple "may earn a lower commission" or none at all – Epic Games Store in Brazil is a recent example. In our view, this highlights a growing Services risk beyond regulation itself. Success is not only tied to retaining developers on the platform, but also ensuring they continue to view the App Store as the preferred distribution and monetization channel. A final observation – this quarter mgmt also talked to potential changes in consumer behavior, as people may shift more time to other AI-powered apps, such as social media and productivity, which may not be as monetizable as gaming apps. All-in, all of these factors are why Apple didn't highlight App Store as a top driver of Services revenue growth this quarter, the first time since Dec '23.

OVERWEIGHT THESIS

With the most elongated iPhone replacement cycles, new AI features rolling out around the world, and a renewed focus on device form factor changes, we believe Apple can accelerate iPhone growth starting in CY26, with replacement cycles peaking as aged installed base starts to upgrade. When combined with consistent, double digit services growth and moderate operating leverage, we believe Apple can earn $10.00 in FY27 and $10.83 by FY28. Memory cost dynamic could create uncertainties in the near term. Longer-term, investments in AI, payments, cloud, health, and home, and long runway to grow spend per user from $1/day today are key arguments for sustained long-term growth and value creation.

BULL CASE

11x EV/Sales FY27; ~41x Bull FY27 P/E of $11.02

iPhone replacement cycles accelerate in FY26/FY27 with Robotics as a long-term upside. Consumer demand returns, and stronger than expected iPhone 17 upgrade intentions + mix shift to higher end iPhones drives mid-teens Y/Y iPhone revenue growth, while rising component costs are mitigated given Apple's bargaining power against consumers and the supply chain. Our bull case valuation implies a 41.1x P/E multiple on FY27 Bull EPS, which embeds $22 per share of upside from its Robotics efforts.

BASE CASE

9.4x EV/Sales CY27 or ~35x CY27 EPS of $10.30

Services and margins remain resilient, while investors start to expect stronger iPhone cycles ahead. Revenue grows mid-teens % Y/Y in FY27, driven by 10%+ Services growth and mid-teens % Products growth. GM may contract Y/Y in FY27 driven by higher Product revenue mix and memory costs, while Apple leverages the supply chain and repricing to mitigate the cost impact. The iPhone replacement cycle is elongating again in FY27 due to demand elasticity amidst memory-induced pricing increases.

BEAR CASE

6.3x EV/Sales FY27; 24.6x FY27 Bear EPS of $7.89

iPhone 17 cycle disappoints as consumer spending weakens more than expected amidst synthetic price increases. Growth slows further across the portfolio as discretionary income is pressured by hard landing, leading to just LSD of Product rev growth and decelerating Services rev growth in FY26. With revenue slightly growing but margin contracting, FY26 EPS will only grow MSD to ~$7.36. Our bear case valuation implies a 24.6x FY27 P/E, below T5Y avg of 26.0x due to plateauing Services profit mix.
