GEV: Still wired to win - reiterating GEV through data center uncertainty, model update

We continue to view GEV as a durable investment, supported by long-term electrification, decarbonization, and energy security trends rather than just a data center play. We believe the following three key elements of our thesis support GEV's durability and mitigate the impact of a potential data center slowdown:

First, Electrification demand is supported by utility spending and grid infrastructure requirements. The Electrification equipment backlog was over $40B in Q2, representing ~3 years of revenue at the current run rate. While data center orders were $5B in H1 or ~38% of Electrification orders, the remaining ~62% was utility driven. Utility spend should continue to grow, supported by grid reliability and resilience investments. A slowdown in data center demand may alleviate generation bottlenecks but would do little to address existing grid constraints, as interconnection queues exceed 5 years in many markets. Substations and transformers must still be built for projects already in the queue - not potential new load.

Second, GEV's Power Services are a resilient recurring revenue stream. The segment benefits from the growth of GEV's ~130 unit HA installed base (~200 units on order) and from high utilization rates for gas plants. Gas plants are increasingly valuable for reliability, balancing and firming, particularly where transmission and storage deployment have not kept up with renewables additions. Higher operating hours support ongoing services demand.

Third, GEV has balance sheet flexibility. GEV's $10B in cash on the balance sheet, and ~100% cash conversion rate allows them to invest in organic and inorganic growth. SSTs, nuclear (300MW boiling water reactor plant), fuel cells, and carbon capture are all investments that may not contribute to earnings until late this decade or early next decade, but provide avenues for future growth.

We maintain our Outperform rating and $1,298 price target, supported by continued earnings growth, strong cash generation, and an increasing contribution from Electrification. We made modest revisions to our estimates following model refinements. While GEV currently trades at ~24x NTM EBITDA on our estimates, our implied YE29 EV/2030 EBITDA multiple declines to ~9x, which we believe better reflects GEV's LT earnings potential.

VALUATION ANALYSIS

A common pushback on GEV is that the stock appears expensive on near-term metrics. On our estimates, GEV is trading at ~24x today, above the peer set average of ~19x. However, we expect EBITDA to roughly double from FY 27 to FY 30, driving down our implied YE 29 multiple to 8.9x versus a peer average of 11.5x, a 22% discount to the group. We view this as highly attractive on a relative basis.

GEV trades at an implied PEG ratio of ~1x based on our earnings forecasts, which we view as reasonable.

Extending our current one-year GEV target price of $1,298 using an expected annual return of 7% (3.5% return for the 6 months from Q2 27 and YE 27) results in a YE 29 value of $1,538. This implies the stock trading at a ~17x EV/NTM EBITDA multiple by YE 29.

REITERATING OUR THESIS

Our thesis remains unchanged. We continue to view GEV as a beneficiary of long-term electrification, decarbonization, and energy security trends rather than purely a data center play. Rising demand for power generation, grid infrastructure, and related services should support sustained growth across the portfolio.

Beyond the well-understood demand outlook for gas turbines, we see additional growth opportunities in Services and Electrification. On the Services side, higher turbine utilization should shorten maintenance cycles, increasing services demand and supporting recurring revenue growth.

We view Electrification as the highest-quality growth segment within GEV, driven by grid build out and rising electricity demand. Given its relatively low market penetration within an estimated ~$300B TAM, we believe the Electrification segment has a longer runway for growth than the Power business. We expect continued investment in transmission and grid infrastructure will be required to connect new generation capacity to the grid, an area where GEV is well positioned through its portfolio of electrical equipment and software solutions.

GEV's strong balance sheet and high cash flow conversion lends them optionality, enabling continued investment in emerging technologies such as fuel cells, CCS, and SMRs.

We view GEV as uniquely positioned across the power value chain through its exposure to generation equipment, grid infrastructure, and services. This diversified exposure allows GEV to benefit from rising electricity demand across generation and grid infrastructure, rather than relying on any single end market.
