Given craft labor constraints, how fast can the US build data centers? In this note, we focus on the mechanical, electrical and plumbing (MEP) trades who assemble the central nervous system of a data center (power distribution and thermal management), analyze the recruitment rates, translate the number of MEP workers into gigawatts of construction potential, and answer how much US data center capacity can be built with this labor pool through 2030. To unlock further growth, the industry is shifting towards a more modular construction approach, a change that may upend the entire profit pool of the construction value chain and a topic we plan to address in tomorrow's follow-up note.

Mechanical / Electrical / Plumbing (MEP) craft labor availability sets the speed limit of US data center construction. At the peak recruitment rates observed over the last 3 years, the US can increase the data center builds by 6 GW per year, which implies that new adds could grow at a ~30% CAGR from 12 GW/yr in 2026 to 35 GW/yr by 2030. This build rate is enough to support the consensus view of 25-35GW/year of new data center capacity adds by 2030. MEP craft labor constructs the critical pathways of a data center: power distribution and thermal management.

The US MEP labor pool is smaller than the 1.8M headline labor force suggests.

Not all MEP workers are qualified, geographically accessible or available. Data center work requires a specialized set of skills, so even after narrowing this pool to non-resi construction (790K), the pool needs further refinement given the high training bar. There is a geographic mismatch between where the data center projects will be built vs. where the labor is – only 30% of the MEP labor resides where 70% of the projects are located. Data centers must compete with the labor needs of other construction projects.

Tradespeople can't be manufactured, so labor recruitment rates will set the construction pace. At recent peak recruitment rates, the US has added ~15K mechanical, ~30K electrical and ~15K plumbing craft laborers. In reality, this recruitment rate likely represents a ceiling: 1) MEP recruitment rates have slowed since the 2023 peak; 2) MEP as a share of the total US labor pool is at a 20-year-high; 3) only craft labor can make craft labor – training is the true bottleneck. In contrast, the 20-year average recruitment rate (excluding down years) is much lower by 5-10K at each position. Under this framework, data center capacity additions cannot grow materially faster unless either labor productivity improves or data centers take a greater share of workers from the rest of the construction economy.

2 company/stock implications. 1) If the MEP craft labor construction ceiling is 35 GW/year by 2030 in the US, then the mid-scale power generation industry (<120 MW/generator), which by our estimate, needs US data center builds to reach 40 GW/year by 2030 for the ongoing capacity adds to make sense, is at risk of overbuild, which would impact CAT and CMI the most. 2) The MEP bottleneck is forcing the industry to change how it builds data centers. The only way to break through the labor ceiling is modularization. This technology shift not only unlocks more data center construction capacity, but it also shifts the profit pool from field to factory floor, which benefits the most vertically integrated OEMs and contractors like ETN, SU, VRT, PWR, LGN, FIX (not covered) and EME (not covered).

DETAILS

Given craft labor constraints, how fast can the US build data centers? In this note, we focus on the mechanical, electrical and plumbing (MEP) trades who assemble the central nervous system of a data center (power distribution and thermal management), analyze the recruitment rates, translate the number of MEP workers into gigawatts of construction potential, and answer how much US data center capacity can be built with this labor pool through 2030. To unlock further growth, the industry is shifting towards a more modular construction approach, a change that may upend the entire profit pool of the construction value chain.

Mechanical / Electrical / Plumbing (MEP) craft labor availability sets the speed limit of US data center construction.

At the peak recruitment rates observed over the last 3 years, the US can increase the data center builds by 6 GW per year, which implies that new adds could grow at a ~30% CAGR from 12 GW/yr in 2026 to 35 GW/yr by 2030. This build rate is enough to support the consensus view of 25-35GW/year of new data center capacity adds by 2030.

MEP craft labor constructs the critical pathways of a data center: power distribution and thermal management.

Electricians install and connect the power infrastructure—from switchgear and transformers to UPS, busway and rack-level distribution (enables the movement of electricity from grid to chip), while mechanical trades install the cooling equipment, piping, ductwork and heat-rejection systems that remove heat from the IT load. Plumbers and pipefitters support the thermal system by installing and connecting the water and liquid-cooling loops. Based on our channel checks, a 100 MW data center build requires 30 mechanical professionals, ~50 electricians and 10 plumbers or 0.3 mechanical, 0.5 electrical and 0.1 plumbing workers per MW.

The US MEP labor pool is smaller than the 1.8M headline labor force suggests. Not all MEP workers are qualified, geographically accessible or economically available. Data center work requires a specialized set of skills, so even after narrowing this pool to construction (1.4M) and non-residential (790K), the eligible workers need further refinement given the higher voltages, weld sizes etc. (more training needed). There is a geographic mismatch between where the data center projects will be built vs. where the labor is – only 30% of the MEP labor resides where 70% of the projects are located. Data center craft labor must compete with the labor needs for other non-resi construction projects, which we build into our model - if all available US MEP craft labor were theoretically redeployed to data center construction, the annual build rate could reach 85 GW/year vs. our base case of 35 GW/year by 2030.

Tradespeople can't be manufactured, so labor recruitment rates will set the construction pace. At recent peak recruitment rates, the US has added ~15K mechanical, ~30K electrical and ~15K plumbing craft laborers. In reality, this recruitment rate likely represents a ceiling: 1) MEP recruitment rates have slowed since the 2023 peak; 2) MEP as a share of the total US labor pool is now at a 20-year-high, which suggests a meaningful change in recruitment rate would be limited; 3) only craft labor can make craft labor – training is the true bottleneck. In contrast, the 20-year average recruitment rate (excluding down years) is much lower at 10K mechanical, ~15K electrical and 10K plumbing craft laborers. In our 2020-25 peak recruitment scenario, our base case, the industry will build an additional 6 GW of data center capacity each year, compared to 2 GW under our 20-year average recruitment rate scenario, which creates a difference of 35 GW vs. ~25 GW of new capacity adds by 2030 or a ~30% vs. ~20% CAGR. Under this framework, data center capacity additions cannot grow materially faster unless either labor productivity improves or data centers take a greater share of workers from the rest of the construction economy.

2 company/stock implications. 1) If the MEP craft labor construction ceiling is 35 GW/year by 2030 in the US, then the mid-scale power generation industry (<120 MW/generator), which by our estimate, needs US data center builds to reach 40 GW/year by 2030 for the ongoing capacity adds to make sense, is at risk of overbuild, which would impact CAT and CMI the most. 2) The MEP bottleneck is forcing the industry to change how it builds data centers. The only way to break through the labor ceiling is modularization. This technology shift not only unlocks more data center construction capacity, but it also shifts the profit pool from field to factory floor, which benefits the most vertically integrated OEMs and contractors like ETN, SU, VRT, PWR, LGN, FIX (not covered) and EME (not covered).
