AMD acquisition of Taalas marks another step toward a differentiated AI inference stack

AMD's announced acquisition of Taalas late last week is particularly interesting to us as it follows the recent partnership with CBRs for disaggregated inference. Taalas designs hardware for a particular model and does so by hard-coding the model into the silicon (much like a number of startups, including Etched and others). As such, we believe the technology should allow AMD to address the memory bottleneck even more aggressively than SRAM-centric architectures such as CBRs and Groq/NVDA. In a GPU, model weights are stored in external HBM and must be repeatedly pulled into compute engines, making memory bandwidth the primary constraint for inference workloads. SRAM-based architectures like CBRs and Groq/NVDA improve on this by placing very large pools of SRAM within the compute, which reduces data movement. However, similar to GPUs, the weights still exist as data stored in memory. Taalas goes one step further by hard-coding the trained model weights directly into the silicon fabric itself. Taalas uses fixed transistor structures for model parameters, eliminating weight fetches from memory entirely. As a result, it can significantly reduce memory requirements to then use SRAM for KV cache, context handling, and other dynamic inference functions. Under this architecture, every new model generally requires a new chip, but it is expected to deliver better performance-per-watt and lower cost versus a GPU or an SRAM-based chip, which could make it an attractive offering for certain high-volume inference workloads. We see the acquisition as an interesting step for AMD, as we think it broadens the company's portfolio of custom compute offerings. AMD could leverage the technology while utilizing its chip-design R&D, supply chain, and customer relationships to scale the business.

Future of Memory Storage 2026 – key highlights and takeaways

We spent a full day at the Future of Memory Storage conference this past week, and came away particularly intrigued by three key themes: (1) the implications to SSDs from explosive KV Cache growth; (2) growing momentum behind CXL-enabled pooled DRAM as hyperscalers increasingly focus on improving memory utilization; and (3) SNDK's initial HBF performance (theoretical) results. While KV cache is not a new theme for investors - particularly NAND bulls - we were surprised by the magnitude of SNDK's estimates for persistent KV cache (which the company defines as Direct Attached SSDs + Network Attached Compute SSDs + Network Attached Storage SSDs). Specifically, the company estimates persistent KV cache capacity requirements could reach ~1ZB by C2030 - and while it did not disclose several key assumptions (e.g., concurrent session retention times, cache miss ratios, average input tokens per second, KV size per token, etc) - the magnitude is just striking to us, as this would mean >70% of C2027E industry bit supply. Further, considering memory suppliers' expansion plans, and the fact that much of the incremental cleanroom capacity will likely prioritize HBM, then DDR, ahead of NAND, we struggle to see where all this incremental NAND capacity could come from. Admittedly, this does read bullish to future NAND supply/demand and pricing dynamics. We also attended a talk by MRVL, in which the co highlighted its CXL solutions and how these could go as far as extending the useful life of legacy memory technologies (like DDR4). More interestingly, MRVL already appears to be working on optical-based disaggregated memory (citing the know-how obtained via Celestial AI deal) to enable local memory-like architectures but locating memory elsewhere than the rack. Separately, MRVL cited internal SRAM-related IP capable of delivering ~17x higher bandwidth/mm² vs. industry alternatives - which we thought was interesting given the potential appeal for hyperscalers to come up with ultra fast inference silicon alternatives (similar to CBRS). Lastly, on HBF, SNDK presented early performance modeling data in an agentic AI workload. In its example, an HBM-only configuration required 8 GPUs simply to fit/run the model, while 4 HBF-enabled GPUs delivered roughly the same token throughput to 8 HBM GPUs (as the latter ultimately spilled into slower system DRAM). SNDK framed these results as delivering up to ~8x better capital efficiency at the minimum configuration level and approximately ~2x GPU efficiency at equivalent token throughput, highlighting how greater memory capacity can unlock materially higher utilization of expensive GPU resources.

Analog earnings in the rearview mirror - upcycle firing on all cylinders

With the vast majority of analog companies having reported, this has been another strong earnings season - see Figure 4 and Figure 5 of our rollup. 2Q revenue came in 1.7% ahead for those having reported and 3Q was a similar 1.6% ahead, while full year CY26/CY27 estimates are up ~1.5%/3%, respectively. By company, TXN and ALGM had the largest revisions among our coverage (CY26E up 2.6% and 2.2%, respectively - Figure 2). By vertical, CY26E revisions in autos are ~2% ahead, Other at ~0.5%, and Industrial flat. Analog revisions for CY26E are ~2% ahead while MCU flat (Figure 3).

While the bottom for the complex was set a few quarters ago, this most recent quarter continued to paint the picture of a sector firmly in recovery - as Industrial/Data Center continue to strengthen along with positive commentary in autos (Figure 7). For example, recall Industrial peaked early in the cycle (in 1Q23), but has now recovered to just ~7% below LT trendline. Autos peaked later (in 4Q23), and is also ~7% below LT trendline. Interestingly, Analog ex-MCU peaked in 1Q23 and is now above LT trendline (based on CQ3 guidance). Lastly, MCUs peaked in 3Q23 and is still ~13% below LT trendline (Figure 8 and Figure 9). Beyond the cyclical recovery, data center remains a secular growth driver that is pushing industry revenue higher, while pricing is starting to become a tailwind as analog companies introduce additional price increases above inflationary input costs. Overall TXN remains our top idea in analog given its combo of share gains and fixed costs during a strong upturn.

Valuation Method and Risk Statement

We use various valuation techniques such as P/E, EV/FCF for valuing the companies in this report. Risk factors include but are not limited to macroeconomic factors such as a downturn in the economy, a disruption of international trade, technological disruption due to new inventions, or business model innovation whereby structural changes in the industry alter the future course of unit sales, ASPs, and revenues.

We use NTM P/E methodology to value ADI. Analog is keyed to the macro-economy, especially the Industrial end market which is ADI's largest, and we see this as a risk both to the upside and downside. Analog names are also levered to Electric Vehicle adoption and we see them as being sensitive to EV adoption rates. Specific to ADI, MXIM integration is also a challenge and opportunity.

TXN: Our valuation is based on an EV/FCF multiple methodology. Texas Instruments faces a variety of risks, including rapidly changing technology, intense competition, high level of capital investment, pricing pressure, and cyclical end-market demand.

Investing in structured investments involves significant risks. For a detailed discussion of the risks involved in investing in any particular structured investment, you must read the relevant offering materials for that investment. Structured investments are unsecured obligations of a particular issuer with returns linked to the performance of an underlying asset. Depending on the terms of the investment, investors could lose all or a substantial portion of their investment based on the performance of the underlying asset. Investors could also lose their entire investment if the issuer becomes insolvent. UBS does not guarantee in any way the obligations or the financial condition of any issuer or the accuracy of any financial information provided by any issuer. Structured investments are not traditional investments and investing in a structured investment is not equivalent to investing directly in the underlying asset. Structured investments may have limited or no liquidity, and investors should be prepared to hold their investment to maturity. The return of structured investments may be limited by a maximum gain, participation rate or other feature. Structured investments may include call features and, if a structured investment is called early, investors would not earn any further return and may not be able to reinvest in similar investments with similar terms. Structured investments include costs and fees which are generally embedded in the price of the investment. The tax treatment of a structured investment may be complex and may differ from a direct investment in the underlying asset. UBS and its employees do not provide tax advice. Investors should consult their own tax advisor about their own tax situation before investing in any securities.

Important Information About Sustainable Investing Strategies: Sustainable investing strategies aim to consider and incorporate environmental, social and governance (ESG) factors into investment process and portfolio construction. Strategies across geographies approach ESG analysis and incorporate the findings in a variety of ways. Incorporating ESG factors or sustainable investing considerations may inhibit the portfolio manager's ability to participate in certain investment opportunities that otherwise would be consistent with its investment objective and other principal investment strategies. The returns on a portfolio incorporating ESG factors or sustainable investing considerations may be lower or higher than portfolios where ESG factors, exclusions, or other sustainability issues are not considered by the portfolio manager, and the investment opportunities available to such portfolios may differ.
